Annex I

Summary of the general debate by the Commission on the Status of Women at its forty-fourth session on agenda items 3 (Follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women) and 4 (Comprehensive review and appraisal of the implementation of the Platform for Action)

Note by the Secretariat

1. During the general debate, 67 Member States, as well as Colombia on behalf of the Rio Group, Nigeria, on behalf of the Group of 77 and China, and Portugal, on behalf of the European Union, Bulgaria, the Czech Republic, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Romania, Slovakia, Slovenia, the associated country Cyprus, the European Free Trade Association, countries members of the European Economic Area and Iceland, in addition to Palestine, addressed agenda items 3 and 4. Speakers made suggestions related to the special session of the General Assembly, entitled “Women 2000: gender equality, development and peace for the twenty-first century” to review progress in implementing the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women and the Beijing Platform for Action.

2. Delegations reaffirmed their commitment to the Beijing Platform for Action as the fundamental document not open to renegotiation. They acknowledged it as an essential instrument for the achievement of gender equality and underlined the importance of seeing the review of its implementation as part of the process for women’s advancement. Delegates emphasized the need for the special session to give a new impetus to the implementation of the Platform for Action, as the five years since its adoption had been too short a time-span for effective implementation of all commitments. The hope was expressed that the review would result in an effective outcome document, with specific, concrete measures and time-bound targets to overcome remaining obstacles. Such a document should be useful not only to Governments, but also to the United Nations system and other key actors, including non-governmental organizations. Future actions and initiatives should be based on best practices and lessons learned from the review and appraisal process, with the promotion and protection of women’s human rights and fundamental freedoms forming the basis for all future actions. The issues that different regions faced in implementing the Platform for Action should also be considered and reflected in the outcome of the special session. Several delegates indicated the need to set measurable targets, and identify strategies and operational mechanisms, rather than determine new goals to fulfil the Beijing commitments. Delegates stressed that the implementation of the commitments required reinforced political commitment, inter alia, through the earmarking of resources and continuous monitoring.

3. Many delegates indicated that, while much progress had been made in implementing the Platform for Action’s recommendations at the international, regional and national levels, significant barriers to full implementation still remained. Those barriers were not insurmountable, but dedicated political will and sufficient resources were required to address them. Committed efforts from society as a whole and partnerships, inter alia, between nations and between Governments and non-governmental and civil society organizations as well as men and women, were also required. The crucial importance of men’s involvement in the promotion of gender equality was particularly stressed. Some delegations called for the active participation of non-governmental organizations in the special session, inter alia, through the expansion of participation of organizations established after the Beijing Conference. The convening of a fifth world conference on women as a natural forum for innovative partnerships between Governments and civil society was also suggested.

4. Several delegations stressed the role of the Commission in ensuring implementation of the Platform for Action. It was noted that the Commission’s future role, programme of work and mandate needed to be assessed and strengthened in the light of the outcome of the special session, and bearing in mind the integrated follow-up to the major United Nations conferences and summits of the 1990s. A few delegates further emphasized the importance of the coordination segment of the substantive session of 2000 of the Economic and Social Council in assessing the progress made within the United Nations system to implement the outcomes of the major United Nations conferences. Interaction and coordination between and among the Council and the functional commissions to strengthen efforts to mainstream a gender perspective required improvement. The Commission's continued ability to play a catalytic role in this regard needed to be ensured.

5. Delegations drew attention to the special role of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women and the contribution of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women to the full implementation of the Platform for Action. Regret was expressed that the Platform for Action's goal of universal ratification by the year 2000 had not been met, although many welcomed the opening of the Optional Protocol to the Convention for signature, ratification and accession. Several delegations indicated their intention to sign the Optional Protocol during the session, or in the near future. Others expressed the intention to ratify or accede to the instrument during 2000. Some delegations emphasized that the Committee's resources would need to be adjusted in the light of its new responsibilities under the Optional Protocol.

6. The important role of international development cooperation in supporting national efforts was underscored by many delegations as creating an enabling environment for the Platform for Action's implementation. Delegations highlighted particular areas in which progress in implementation of the Platform for Action had been made. These included the increased awareness of the gender dimensions of national policies ranging from security to social and economic concerns. There had been increased worldwide attention to poverty and gender-based violence against women, reduction in women's illiteracy rates, reduction in maternal mortality and the strengthening of institutional mechanisms for the advancement of women. Gender mainstreaming had emerged as the key global strategy to implement measures to promote equality between women and men and the evaluation of progress in its implementation was urged, as was the integration of a life-cycle approach into all actions.

7. During the discussion, a number of issues were identified as constituting particular challenges to the further implementation of the Platform for Action. These included the lack of human and financial resources. Concern was expressed that globalization, although providing opportunities for women, also had the capacity to affect them negatively, and to deprive them of their human rights, including the right to development. Unequal access to improved communications technology also constituted a challenge, as did the human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS) pandemic, which was affecting Africa disproportionately. The persistence and deepening of poverty among women and girls, especially certain groups, such as indigenous women and girls and older women, also constituted an obstacle, which was exacerbated in situations of transition and economic crisis. Developing countries highlighted the impact of the debt burden on implementation, while delegates, particularly from Asia, drew attention to the disproportionate impact of recent financial crises on women. Stereotypic attitudes towards the gender roles of women and men impeded the achievement of equality and encouraged such discriminatory practices as gender-based violence against women and traditional practices harmful to the health of women and girls. The proliferation of civil unrest, political upheaval and armed conflict, as well as international terrorism, with their attendant gender-specific abuses and the resulting displacement, particularly of women and children, both internally and across State borders remained a significant challenge.

8. Delegates provided information during the debate on actions taken to implement the Platform for Action. The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and its gender-sensitive provisions and procedures were highlighted, as was the adoption of the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. Regional, subregional and national programmes to address violence against women were cited, including efforts to combat trafficking in women. Many delegations described the formulation of national action plans and specific allocations for gender programming within national budgets. In addition, gender-mainstreaming strategies, the establishment and strengthening of institutional mechanisms for the advancement of women, law reform and reproductive health programmes were mentioned. In most cases, this information had been reflected in government responses to the questionnaire regarding the implementation of the Platform for Action.

9. Delegations acknowledged the contribution of the United Nations system, as reflected in the assessment of the implementation of the system-wide medium-term plan for the advancement of women, including lessons learned. These serve as the basis for the preparation of the new plan for the period 2002-2005. New efforts were called for in order to achieve the goal of 50/50 gender balance in the United Nations Secretariat by the year 2000.

Annex II

Summary submitted by Ms. Dubravka Šimonović, moderator of the panel discussion entitled “Outlook on gender equality, development and peace beyond the year 2000”, held by the Preparatory Committee on 6 March 2000

1. On 6 March 2000, the Commission on the Status of Women acting as the preparatory committee for the special session of the General Assembly entitled “Women 2000: gender equality, development and peace for the twenty-first century”, held a panel discussion entitled “Outlook on gender equality, development and peace beyond the year 2000”, which was followed by a dialogue among the panellists, Member States and representatives of non-governmental organizations. The panellists were: Yoriko Meguro (Japan), Professor, Sophia University, who discussed population, fertility and development from a gender perspective; Rosalba Todaro Cavallero (Chile), Economic Adviser, Servicio Nacional de la Mujer, who discussed gender aspects of globalization and poverty; Carolyn McAskie, Emergency Relief Coordinator a.i., Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, United Nations, who discussed gender, humanitarian assistance and conflict resolution; and Krisztina Morvai (Hungary), Eötvös Loránd University, who discussed gender and human rights in the context of democratic transition.
2. Participants at the panel discussion and the dialogue noted that the effects of globalization were not the same for women and men. The process of economic restructuring and adjustment of national economies to the requirements of globalization brought with it substantive changes in tax systems, the reduction of public expenditures and labour costs, through reduced contribution to social security, and greater vulnerability of the individual. Women were differently affected owing to their vulnerable position in the labour market caused by job segregation. There was a need for compensatory policies that addressed the effects of restructuring, on the one hand, and policies that would restructure the women’s agenda, enhancing women’s capacity to take full advantage of the global economic changes, on the other. In order to successfully implement these policies, gender mainstreaming had to be implemented at all levels of Government. At the same time, protective measures were needed for women in irregular and temporary employment.
3. Several speakers mentioned that there was a need to value the reproductive work of women and include it in the gross domestic product (GDP) and tax system. It was noted that family responsibilities restricted women’s choices and often obliged them to accept work of poorer quality, with less pay and social protection. The division of labour between men and women, in particular between productive and reproductive activities, was an underlying factor that needed to be addressed. Advocacy was needed to raise awareness and give a higher profile to women’s contributions. In this respect, the introduction of the gender budget was considered an important step.
4. It was emphasized that the impact of globalization was mixed. While globalization had brought rapid growth in some countries, it increased recession in others. The negative impact of globalization, in particular its impact on public expenditures for health and education, was a major challenge. The micro-macro economic balance was affected in some countries. At the microeconomic level, women were among the poorest of the poor, in particular in the rural areas of developing countries.
5. Concern was expressed by some speakers about the impact of globalization and structural adjustment measures that deprived some Governments of resources needed for social development and the promotion of gender equality, inter alia, for the implementation of the recommendations of global conferences such as the Fourth World Conference on Women and the International Conference on Population and Development. The debt burden of many developing countries was an additional obstacle that had an impact on much-needed programmes in the field of reproductive health and human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS) prevention and treatment. It was noted that countries in the Asia-Pacific region felt particularly affected by cuts in the public sector. There was a risk that gains made in developing countries would be lost and that the situation would worsen in the near future.

6. Participants noted the well-documented correlation, in particular in developing countries, between women's education and fertility rate, as well as between women's education and infant and maternal mortality rates. The link between poverty, illiteracy and rural residence was highlighted. In industrialized countries, there was a relationship between fertility and social responses, which could take the form of government policies or private sector or individual initiatives. However, it was stressed that the effects of education were different in a given context and analysis should take into consideration other data and facts. There was general agreement that further efforts should be deployed to enhance the education of women and girls.

7. With regard to implementation of the Platform for Action, it was noted that Governments and politicians often had limited information on women's rights and issues and were not familiar with international documents such as the Platform for Action. The question was raised how the actors identified in the Platform for Action, such as branches of Governments, civil society, professional associations and the international community, could be made better aware of the recommendations addressed to them.

8. Suggestions for Governments, in particular in Central and Eastern Europe, included media coverage of United Nations-based campaigns for women's rights, or a visit of a high-ranking United Nations official.

9. In the area of humanitarian assistance and conflict resolution, speakers noted with concern that the systematic and strategic targeting of civilian populations in modern wars had a disproportionate effect on women and girls, since 80 per cent of all refugees and internally displaced persons were women and children. Their basic economic and social rights, as well as civil and political rights, were severely affected. Conflict increased women's vulnerability to sexual violence and rape and put them at risk for sexually transmitted diseases, including HIV/AIDS, and unwanted pregnancies. Rape often led to rejection and marginalization of the victim and, in particular, of children born of rape. The loss of husband and children often caused a loss of identity for women whose status had been defined solely by the roles of wife and mother and who faced widowhood and female headship of their household.

10. Special emphasis was put on the recognition of rape as a war crime which represented an important step forward. Speakers called upon the special session of the General Assembly to address in particular the plight of girls with unwanted pregnancies resulting from rape. They recommended severe punishment for those perpetrating gender-specific war crimes against women. It was emphasized that there were gaps between governmental knowledge of and sensitivity towards violence against women. A call was made for non-governmental organizations and delegates to work together to effectively implement the Platform for Action's recommendations.

11. Recent efforts of the international community to integrate gender into humanitarian activities, inter alia, at the inter-agency level and by the Security Council, were welcome. There was a general agreement that humanitarian efforts could be effective only if they were gender-sensitive. Representatives called for the protection of civilians, particularly women and children, through: distribution of food; counselling and legal, medical and other forms of support; training for women and their involvement in development and reconstruction projects; and gender-sensitivity training of humanitarian workers. Mainstreaming efforts should be applied during the whole process, inter alia, when delivering aid. Measures should be taken to reduce violent conflict through comprehensive prevention and to promote a culture of peace. Representatives of non-governmental organizations urged Governments to recognize women as equal partners, effective actors and experienced contributors to preventative diplomacy, peacemaking, peacekeeping and peace-building. The importance of equal participation of women at all levels of decision-making in conflict prevention, management and resolution, as well as post-conflict reconstruction and peace-building processes, was highlighted. It was suggested that gender quotas for all peace processes be introduced. Speakers urged Governments to reallocate military expenditures for development and peaceful purposes. They also called for an end to impunity for crimes committed against women in armed conflict and the ratification of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court.

12. The issues of trafficking in and violence against women were of concern to many representatives. Gender-sensitive education and training — targeting children in general but also professional groups such as law enforcement personnel — were seen as being of vital importance for the detection and prevention of violence against women. There was also recognition that advocacy and education alone were insufficient when women lacked the economic means to break free from domestic or other forms of violence. Speakers urged international organizations to provide economic assistance in creating job opportunities for women. Legislation was identified as an important vehicle to combat violence and trafficking. Other measures included cooperation among States, support and allocation of resources for the rehabilitation of victims of trafficking and a concerted, coordinated international effort to punish perpetrators.
